Trying to Prevent a Marriage. Special to the Indianapolis Journal.

GREENSBURG, Ind., Nov. 6.-Sheriff Davis went to Elkhart this morning to try and prevent the marriage of Miss Daisy Duncan, the sixteen-year-old daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Andrew Duncan, who live near Middlebranch, and Henry Dowdle, a former Decatur county resident, who is now employed at that place. Miss Duncan left last Wednesday for a visit at Milroy. When she reached that place she telephoned her parents and asked permission to go to Elwood, where she has relatives, and secured their consent. The parents, after thinking matters over, became suspicious of the change in the daughter's mind about visiting at Milroy and communicated with Elwood, only to find the girl had not been there. They then sent the sheriff to Elkhart, but it is probable that he will be too

Tippecanoe County Ditches.

Special to the Indianapolis Journal. LAFAYETTE, Ind., Nov. 6 .- Protesting farmers of Lauramie township, who accuse former county surveyor Melville W. Miller of failure to perform his duty in connection with the construction of drainage ditches in their district, will appear before the court here on Monday and present their objections to the court's approval of Mr. Miller's report, which was submitted last March. It stated that the work on the ditches was about completed according to contract, while the remonstrators aver not a single ditch has been finished. In all, $100,000 has been expended to perfect the drainage system, and the farmers say they have not benefited any from the expenditure. The matter has been agitated for years, and is now approaching a crisis.

MADISON SQUARE GARDEN.

Dowie did not find Madison Square Gar- their father. den pre-empted for the political rallies of the campaign when he came here to convert a scoffing city. When he thinks it all over afterward he may find in this fact a partial clew to his failure. Wise men keep away from the garden if they have a message to deliver. The prophet's first night there was prophetic of what came after. He could not hold the crowd. After he had spoken a few minutes men got up and went out. Other and better orators have had the same humiliation. Dowle's first battle was with the garden itself, and the huge amphitheater simply put another score to its long and fatal record. No man has ever held a crowd there; perhaps none ever will. New Yorkers know this; visitors have to learn it. The Democratic national committee learned it in 1892 when it notified Cleveland and Stevenson of their nominations. Both candidates went through a dumb show; it was not a very edifying spectacle. Poor Bryan, with the laurels of his "crown of thorns" speech still green upon him, learned it to his cost in 1896; he addressed a dissolving show. The initial effect of his descent upon "the enemy's country" was lost in an unavailing struggle against an acoustic proposition too big for him, too big for any man. Singers fare a little better: Patti's marvelous voice floated all over the house when she appeared there in 1892. But grand opera avoids it, and every light summer opera that is anything more than a succession of spectacles has had disastrous collisions with its stubborn properties, when it has essayed them. The garden is a place for band concerts. saengerfests, elephant quadrilles, hippodromes, animal shows-including ballets, if you please. Under the ribs of its huge rafters a voice of gold rings as hollow and harsh as brass alloy. None of the modulations and nuances of delightful speech are possible to the orator; he must organize his delivery on a frankly megaphone plan, and one megaphone sounds very like another. With Daniel O'Connell dead, there may never be a man who could really master the garden. McCarthy has said: "As the orator of a monster meeting he probably never had an equal in these countries." His was a herculean frame, a voice "almost unequaled for strength and sweetness." From the Hill of Tara he is said to have addressed a quarter of a million of Irishmen. Lord Lytton thought "no clarion could have sent its sound even to the center" of that crowd. But Lytton adds: And as I thought, rose the sonorous swell

Goschen Replies to Camberlain. LIVERPOOL, Nov. 6.- Lord Goschen. formerly chancellor of the exchequer, speaking here to-day said he favored retaliation under extraordinary circuitstances requiring heroic legislation, but he was opposed to giving the government a mandate authorizing retaliatory tariffs. The speaker added that Joseph Chamberlain's policy was dan-gerous and that it was untatesmanlike to characterize those who were not prepared to accept it as being unfriendly to the colonies. He denied that there were any signs of the decay of the industries of he United Kingdom and he supported his statement by statistics. The speaker further asserted that "foreign communities are fleeced by the
